

Kitchen Renovation vs. Kitchen Remodeling

Remodeling your kitchen has the potential to put a new face on your home's interior. Home kitchens are central areas and are for many a very practical working area. Remodeling your kitchen for aesthetic purposes can be very satisfying. Kitchen remodeling can also be very practical. Converting your small kitchen into a larger space with new kitchen appliances and state of the art equipment can mean a better experience for the homeowner. Re-facing your kitchen cabinets or installing a new kitchen countertop can also enhance your kitchen's beauty and usability.

When is it considered a kitchen renovation as opposed to kitchen remodeling?

It doesn't matter what you call it... remodeling your kitchen in most cases can be considered a renovation. Kitchen renovations are interior home renovations and usually do not require special permits or plans. If adding space is required the kitchen renovation can become quite serious and you might need to consult an architect first if your existing house's structure would have to be changed or built on. Finding a good kitchen expert to help plan and complete your kitchen renovation is very important. Ask for sample tiles and pictures of previous work. References are a definite must, and if possible request to see some recent work in person (although not always possible—some people who have just renovated their kitchen might be very excited to show it off).

The cost of remodeling your kitchen will depend on the type of changes that you plan to make. For instance a wood kitchen countertop will be cheaper to install than a marble kitchen countertop. If reconstruction of the current space is necessary, costs will be more than the costs of simply re-facing your kitchen to give your kitchen a newer look. The average cost for a kitchen renovation is upward of $10,000
